

Why Become Involved in Student Activities?

- Fact ... students who are involved in co-curricular activities during high school have higher achievement, improved attendance, and higher aspirations.
- Fact ... high school students who are involved in co-curricular activities are less likely to use drugs or participate in binge drinking.
- Fact ... student activities provide opportunities for applying the school curriculum to life situations and practices.
- Fact ... student activities promote achievement, citizenship, and service to the community.
- Fact ... student activities open avenues for involvement to the student.
- Fact ... student activities develop self-esteem, self-confidence and social cooperation.
- Fact ... student activities develop personal traits that enhance a student's marketability in the cooperate community.
- Fact ... students who participate in activities in high school continue to be active in college and beyond.
- Fact ... student activities foster the development of skills, such as problem solving, that directly enhance student performance in academic settings.
- Fact ... student activities can give students the opportunity to address important issues and seek solutions to subject matter not commonly found in traditional classroom studies that could include, racial and ethnic tolerance, violence, and others.
- Fact ... student activities encourage participation and risk-taking.
- Fact... in a 1985 study by V. L. Baker, 84% of the students surveyed said that the combination of classes and student activities afforded them their best preparation for citizenry, work, higher education, and later leadership roles.
- Fact... student activities provide opportunities to demonstrate and practice in the values of honesty, courtesy, respect, and fairness -- in other words.
- Fact... student activities celebrate both student achievement and effort.
- Fact ... Breaking Ranks: Changing an American Institution (NASSP) recognizes co-curricular activities as an integral part of a high school education by providing opportunities for all students to support and extend academic learning.